

Day Six - Juneau, Alaska

Last night right before sunset while we were having dinner, a "wall of death" fog rolled in.

As we moved into it, you could immediately hear the ships fog horn go off and the temperature plummeted.

We closed the balcony door, got on our knees and prayed for our lives (not really). But we did get our warm woolies on!! It was pretty cool, literally.

We docked in the city of Juneau at 10AM. This is the capital of Alaska and the only State capital in the USA only accessible by boat or plane, you cannot drive there because, once again, it is on an island.

The previous home of Sarah Palin, the city has a population of only 32,000 people. The original Russian Orthodox Church is very close to the governors mansion, so perhaps that's what former Gov. Palin meant by she "could see Russia"???

If yesterday was about eagles, then today was about whales, I'll let the pictures do the talking.

Once we were done with playing with whales, we stopped off to see that the sea lions were up to. This little one was saying, "Hey! Is there any room up there for me?"

Pretty damn spectacular! The view of the mountains wasn't all that bad either.

We then went on to view one of the many local glaciers.

Cheers,
